I, GERALD GALLAGHER, declare:

1. I graduated from Temple University, located in Pennsylvania. I plan to take the LSAT in October 2003 and am interested in taking an LSAT preparation class in Burbank, California this summer.

2. I was interested in taking a TestMasters LSAT prep course so I went to what I believed was their website, www.testmasters.com. The website stated that TestMasters was not offering courses in California this summer. I was confused by this and wondered why they had stopped offering courses in California when I knew they had offered LSAT classes in California in the past.

3. I then did some research and found a website for another TestMasters at www.testmasters.180.com. I was again confused because I did not know which one was the legitimate TestMasters that I was looking for.

4. I then called the TestMasters based in California, and they told me that they have been offering LSAT preparation courses for the past 12 years, which made me realize that they are the real TestMasters that I was looking for. If I had not taken the trouble to investigate, I would not have found the real TestMasters and probably would have ended up taking a course from someone else.

I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the United States of America that the foregoing is true and correct.
