I, Priscilla Wu, declare as follows:

1. I am the mother of Chris Wu, a college student. A few months back I had browsed the web and found TestMasters on a search engine. I clicked on the link. However, I did not look at the website address in order to memorize the website address. I read through the website and then called TestMasters. I talked to a TestMasters enrollment counselor about the TestMasters program. After my conversation and after what I have ~~seen~~<sup>seen</sup> on the web I made up mind to enroll my son in TestMasters' LSAT test preparation course.

2. About a month later when I was ready to enroll my son, I went to what I thought was a TestMasters website at www.testmasters.com. I clicked on the LSAT link and then I clicked on the California link. The website stated that the company will not be offering LSAT courses in the year 2003. I then signed up my son for another LSAT preparations course, not TestMasters.

3. Then on another day I browsed through the search engine and again came across the same TestMasters as I did on the first time. I clicked on the website and saw they are now offering LSAT preparation classes. I became very confused and contacted TestMasters and told them about my experience. TestMasters informed me that I had been looking at the website of another company named Test Masters and that TestMasters has not gone out of business and is offering courses in California this summer.

4. Because of this, I took my son out of the other LSAT preparation program and enrolled my son into the TestMasters course in Pasadena, California.

5. If I had not done research on the web the second time I would not have

1 enrolled my son in the TestMasters course in Pasadena, California.

3 I declare under penalty of perjury under the laws of the United States of
